“Okuizome” (first meal) is the Japanese traditional ritual that parents and their family perform around the 100th day after the birth of their baby (time to start weaning) to wish the baby will never starve. The person (in the most case, the oldest one) pretends to feed the baby grilled fish (sea bream) or UME-BOSHI (salted plums) first. And the person touches the baby’s gums with the chopsticks that touched a stone (HAGATAME NO ISHI) to wish to grow the baby’s strong tooth. After that, the person pretends to feed the baby in order of rice, soup, rice, and grilled fish and repeats this process three times.

Meaning of Each Dish

on Okuizome zen

(There are various theories.)

Rice with red beans

Red color of rice represents the sun, and red beans represent bright and sharing stars.

Soup

Parents hope their babies will be good at sucking. They hope babies can suck a lot of milk and grow up healthy.

UMEBOSHI

The parents hope their babies will live long.

HAGATAME

The parents hope their babies will have strong and healthy tooth.

Grilled fish (Sea bream/ Tai)

The parents hope their babies will grow healthy.
